Tag Steam Navy of England 'is the title of a work of great interest and practical. value by Mr H. Williams, Chief Inspector of Machinery, Royal Navy, which has just 0.75 been published. The author will be remembered by not a few in Hongkong ashaving been at one time stationed here. The chief sim which Mr Williams has in . view, as he tells as in his preface, is to submit for consideration and discussion certain points with reference to the future of our Navy, and to suggest by inquiry and deduction what he calls the 'Navy's final form. The subject of increasing the fighting power of our ships, by utilising the services of those who under the present system are non-combatants, is dealt with very ably. The various subjects are handled in a thoroughly practical manner. His suggestions with reference to the war training of our seamen and the excellent system of organisation which he defines are well worthy of consideration. He is in a position to speak with all the authority of long personal experience and observation on the subject of forced 1.00 draught and its effects on boilers, tubes. furnaces, &c., and he says, very truly, that a good deal of cobbling has been done on the boilers of Her Majesty's ships so that they may pass their full-power trials and that the ships have been ' lame ducks' for a long time afterwards. The book is intended for non-professional readers and should commend itself to all who take an interest in our Navel affairs.

In Florence, off and on, he seems to have resided since his retirement; and now we hear by wire that the good man has passed away, amid the regrets of old friends and acquaintances. To those who knew him in Hongkong the news of his death will recall many a pleasant hour, although the mo imperishable memories of him will doubtless be his kindness to the poor sick and afflicted, to whom he was over a friend in

A story comes from Massachusetts which is not intended to please the total abstainers. These persons are just now rather clated with themselves over the centenerian Dr Severin Wielobycki. But they have no monopoly of the centenarians, though they make such a fuss of their one. Twenty-five years ago a doctor of Massachusetts died aged 105, and the abstinence party sent a deputation to his grandson to see if they could not elicit some useful corroboration for their views. 'Oh yes, my grandfather was a man of very regular habits, said the grandson. And then it came out that he had regularly taken a gless of rum the first thing in the morning, another at eleven o'clock, two glasses at early dinner, one more at tea, and another on going to bed. He rerely had a pipe out of his mouth, and every week bought twenty-one inches of pigtall tobacco, which he cut up into seven pieces, consuming a piece each day. 'Regular habits' is a convenient phraso.

THE Straits Times says :- The Collector and Magistrate at Matang in Perak has been actively bunting down man-enting crocodites in his district with such success that, last month, the Penghulu of Trong came and reported in connection with this crusade that 16 of them altogether have been caught with the book and line (panching), including a monster 19 feet tong and 9 feet in girth. The people naturally expected to find the remains of all their missing friends, lately devoured, interred within this borrible brute, but obesity proved that he had been living well. Seven other reptiles have run away with the hooks and lines, so that 28 have been hooked in all.
